Real People . . . Real Places . . .
Anishinabe and Native Curing

They call me "medicine man."

Right there in Deer River they say, "Here's the medicine man."

I don't like that stuff, that medicine, because it's too rough. I said, "Leave that alone."

And I don't like the name of it either—I don't like the name "the medicine man." And I don't like what they tell about me. When they say "the medicine man," other Indians hear that and they think, "Oh, he's got power then."

"That's not my name," I'm thinking.

So begins Paul Buffalo’s chapter on medicine men and medicine women. He didn’t like the term, but, he said, “If I don’t use the term ‘medicine man’ the white people will never know what I’m talking about.”

So “medicine man” it is. . . .

And this week we’ll have a look at and listen to two important medicine men: the universally-loved “Jimmy” Jackson, from Fond-du-Lac, and the highly-respected and honored Paul Buffalo himself, from Leech Lake. On Wednesday we’ll also hear Dr. Andrija Puharich giving us an “etic” view of his “medicine man” friend Zé Arigó—“The Surgeon of the Rusty Knife” from Brazil.

We start Monday with a look at Jimmy Jackson, one of the next younger generation native healers (to Paul Buffalo and his generation) . . .

Both Paul and Jimmy in their days regularly gave lectures to classes at UMD. And this week they’ll give you their “emic” view of the world, and their place in it.

"Jackson, revered Ojibwa medicine man, tells how he became a medicine man. The interviews, conducted from 1987-1992, reveal traditional Ojibwa culture as well as the practices of the medicine man."

“A descendant of Pezeke, the great ‘Chief Buffalo’ of Lake Superior, Paul Buffalo was born near the fork of the Leech and Mississippi Rivers in 1900. . . . In his early youth Paul Buffalo witnessed the traditional ways of northern Minnesota Ojibwa and their continuing encounter with the white man and his roads, railroads, river boats, values, and ways of life. . . . Paul Buffalo’s life history provides a very personal statement about his people and their relationship to the land. . . . Ojibwa of the Lake Superior area respected their land and lived in intimate spiritual contact with nature. . . .”
(From the “Introduction” to The Paul Buffalo Trilogy [http://www.d.umn.edu/cla/faculty/troufs/Buffalo/PB33.html#title])

The reading assignments for this week include a paper on Paul Buffalo, "Nature and the Concept of Power Among Mississippi and Lake Superior Ojibwa: Reflections of Paul Buffalo" from When Everybody Called Me Gah-bay-bi-nayss: "Forever-Flying-Bird" An Ethnographic Biography of Paul Peter Buffalo, Timothy G. Roufs. The paper can be found at <http://www.d.umn.edu/cla/faculty/troufs/Buffalo/28power5.html#title>. The first part is my (etic) introduction to Paul and Anishinabe peoples; the second part is Paul’s (emic) description of how he and his people get spiritual power from nature—spiritual power they use in healing individuals and the collective soul. If you want, focus on what Paul Buffalo has to say. Some of these same things we will see in excerpts from an interview videotaped by students at UMD [excerpts transcript].

As mentioned above, we’ll finish off the week in Brazil, with Dr. Andrija Puharich giving us an “etic” view of his “medicine man” friend Zé Arigó—“The Surgeon of the Rusty Knife”—as Puharich considers “Ten Characteristics of a Complete Healer.”

And maybe we’ll have a brief look at some aspects of Anishinabe curing. As time permits, we’ll check in on the Anishinabe curers and continue to see how and why native healing practices like we’re looking at work worldwide. They’re powerful. And I as I mentioned earlier, their ability to heal is based on power and the belief in power. You can see how that works in the paper noted above, on "Nature and the Concept of Power Among Mississippi and Lake Superior Ojibwa: Reflections of Paul Buffalo" <http://www.d.umn.edu/cla/faculty/troufs/Buffalo/28power5.html#title>.

Next week we’ll start with your Presentations. Useful information on Presentations can be found at <http://www.d.umn.edu/cla/faculty/troufs/anth4616/cppresentations.html#title>. I’m looking forward to seeing what you have been working on for the semester.
