I had never heard of Samuel Greenberg. I was deeply involved with the works of Hart Crane, had set a number of his poems, and was even inspired to write purely instrumental compositions based on some of his fantastic imagery. It was through Crane that I stumbled upon the Loose Pages through his documented praise of Greenberg. I found myself remarkably engrossed with these terse works - their pure surrealist tone, which antedates the more famous movement begun after World War I, are imbued with an expressiveness that immediately penetrated my mind. My response, these songs which were composed in the Fall of 2000, were written with a number of characteristics in mind to help convey hopefully more than just the sentiments (if that is indeed possible!) of the texts of the Poet. His poems are "orgies of supersensibility" (Louis Untermeyer, 1940) wherein "words... poured ...forth with a wild, chaotic passion" (James Laughlin, 1939) and therefore a narrative structure would not have been a favorable choice of settings. Instead, I tried to take a distinct musical point of view with them.

The only image of Greenberg I know is that of him at the time of his Bar Mitzvah: the dusty, dark synagogues of early 20th century New York instantaneously came to mind. The unison rhythmic, declamatory intonations of Jewish chant, the cascade of words as if a supplication, the propulsive nature of the poems themselves, the sinuous, fleeting emotions that characterize Greenberg's words, the intimate yet universal essence of his utterances, the quality of the voice of youth turned adult only to be cut down in premature death, the fact that he played piano, the speed with which the texts were written - all of these factors contributed to my choice of sounds that surround and clothe them.

Note: All unique spellings from the original texts have been adjusted for ease of reading.
