

CITATIONS: A BRIEF GUIDE

Because your papers will be written using endnotes rather than a parenthetical citation style, it is not necessary to include a bibliography or list of works cited. Rather, you must provide complete citation information within the endnotes. Below are examples of how various types of documents (both secondary and primary sources) should be cited. The examples are meant only to be illustrative, and the examples do not cover every type of source you might encounter. If you have questions about citing the sources you are using, please ask me.

If you are quoting from a source (or citing an argument or other information contained within a source), you must provide the page number(s). If you are referring to a source as a whole, and if the source is a journal article or chapter in an edited collection, you must identify the full range of its page numbers (e.g., 289-302 in the Gettleman citation below). It is not necessary to provide the range of page numbers for a book, but you must include page numbers if you are quoting from or referring to specific portions of the book.

After citing a source for the first time in your endnotes, you may refer to the source in abbreviated form in later notes. For example, after citing Christina Klein's book for the first time using the format provided below, later citations would appear as Klein, Cold War Orientalism, 237 (if you were quoting or citing page 237).
